

Connecticut Water has set-up 5 more water filling stations for private well owners in the towns of Canton, Farmington, Tolland and the Unionville section of Farmington. The complete of water fill stations is listed below – the new stations are marked with an asterisk.

Connecticut Water Company is a public water utility that serves nearly 90,000 customers, or about 300,000 people, in 55 communities across Connecticut. All Connecticut Water customers have full water service. The company has set-up three filling stations to benefit private well owners who have lost their power.

Connecticut Water Company recognizes how essential water is to life. During the snow storm and the power outages in its aftermath we have been able to maintain water service to more than 99 percent of our customers. However, we know that many people who have private wells have not had water for drinking, sanitation, bathing, etc. since the power went out.

The company and its employees are committed to serving the community and helping private well owners who don't have access to clean, safe water. Connecticut Water has established two water filling stations that are located in Ellington and Tolland.

People will need to bring their own containers. We encourage people to use only clean, safe containers for water that will be used for drinking, food preparation, brushing teeth, etc. Any container is fine if the water is to be used for filling toilets or other purposes where it will not be consumed.

Connecticut Water plans to have the water filling stations available until power is restored in these communities.
